

15 mins

Science

The layers of epithelial cells that form our air sacs (or alveoli) are only one layer thick so as to allow molecules of oxygen and carbon dioxide to pass through. The way they are all connected together makes them look a bit like cobblestones.